"The war is on for your mind," sings Anthony Farrell, one half of the soulful Austin duo Greyhounds, "and we're on the same side." Arriving midway through the band's adventurous new album, 'Change Of Pace,' the line serves as a powerful refrain, with Farrell's voice peaking in intensity over musical partner Andrew Trube's chirping electric guitar. But more than just a memorable hook, it's an encapsulation of the shift in consciousness that defines the album, Greyhounds' second—and finest—collection of funky, blues-and-R&B-laced rock and roll for the iconic Ardent label.

Trube and Farrell first met while living in California, where an L.A. Weekly classified ad brought them together. The connection between the guitarist and keyboard player was instantaneous, and the remarkable magic they conjure together has since earned them widespread attention from critics and peers alike. Derek Trucks raved that "Greyhounds make real music, the right way and for the right reasons," while JJ Grey described their songs as landing "somewhere between a heartfelt hymn and the dirtiest jank you've ever heard in your life," and Gary Clark Jr. summed up a recent LA show by tweeting simply that they "crushed it as usual." Meanwhile, Esquire hailed their debut as "intoxicating [and] gut-wrenchingly lovely," USA Today compared them to "The Meters, Earl Hooker and Buck Owens," and Texas Monthly fell under the spell of their "ringing guitar...bluesy swagger, and all the pain a strained falsetto can convey."

"The year's best album so far...absolutely fantastic."
- Boston Herald

"Like Beck meets Funkadelic...there is a specific brand of erratic, wide eyed gusto endemic to the duo's music."
- Nerdist

"A crystal-clear face-lift which Sly Stone could groove on."
- Austin Chronicle

"A warm, weathered coziness that's catnip to anybody who loves classic Memphis soul and Southern rock as much as this duo."
- AllMusic

"The group's psychedelic soul is a potent and eclectic mix."
- PopMatters
